

somewhere right now, someone feels exactly what you're feeling. they're just too caught up in their own quiet storm to look up, and so are you.
you are not as alone as the silence makes you feel.

the world lives in everyone

a mindful journaling and community platform built for self-reflection and empathy.

why free?

everyone deserves a
space to just exist.

reflection shouldn't be a privilege. your income, your status, your circumstances. none of it should determine whether you have access to a space that simply listens. sonder will always be free. that's not a feature. that's the whole point.

an honest disclaimer

sonder is a space and a tool to assist. what happens inside you is still entirely up to you. this app cannot fix you, heal you, or do the work for you. it can only hold the door open. whether you walk through it is yours to decide.

“you can have all the tools you need, but if you don't take action, nothing will change.”

the story behind the app

built from something i was embarrassed to admit

it started with an assignment to create my own brand logo.

i got no an ideas, no visions. build it with just shapes and colors i liked and a word that felt like meaningful. i didn't know what the brand would be yet. but the more i sat with the meaning of everything i'd put into that logo, the more it started to reflect something back at me.

project by project, i kept being asked to build on it. and somewhere in that process, i stopped just completing assignments and started actually thinking: "what do i want this to be?"

the answer, if i'm being honest, had been there for a while. i liked journaling and im very introspective, but i've also always been embarrassed about it. it feels vulnerable to admit, especially when the people around you don't do it- like you're trying too hard, trying to be different or taking yourself too seriously. so you keep it quiet. but existing apps weren't helping either. most of them are plain and predictable. Its the same prompts recycled until you stop opening the app entirely. and journaling on paper, though more intimate, isn't always practical. i wanted something that felt considered. something worth returning to.

the community side came from a simpler place: reading other people's honest thoughts makes you feel less alone in yours. you can also. lean from their stories and experiences. it normalises something that shouldn't need normalising. and if someone out there is hiding their journal the same way i was, maybe sonder is the place neither of us knew we needed.

journal prompts

a sampler of what awaits you each morning.

some extras:

what's a story you've been telling yourself about who you are that you've never actually questioned?

if your closest friend described
you honestly- not kindly,
honestly. what do you think they'd say?

what part of yourself do you
only show when you're alone?

what are you pretending not to want because it feels safer not to want it?

what conversation have you been putting off and what are you actually afraid will happen
if you have it?

is there something you've already forgiven others for but haven't forgiven yourself for yet?

the space

a room with different rules.

sonder isn't a social media platform. It's a space designed around one idea: you should be able to exist here without performing.

private journal

only for you. daily prompts and evening check-in to gently challenge your perspective, help you live more intentionally, or simply give your thoughts somewhere to go. no one will ever read this unless you choose to share it.

shared space

if you want to share, you can. whether you stay anonymous or not is your choice. there is no view counts, no likes, no reposts.
just words and the people who needed to read them. you can read people's story and learn from them.

sonder

coined by John Koenig, 2012
orig. - The Dictionary of Obscure sorrows

the realisation that each passerby has a life as vivid and complex as your own

A life populated with their own ambitions, friends, routines, worries, and depth. A story that continues invisibly around you- full of joy and grief in which you might appear only once as a stranger in the passing, a blurry face they won't recall.

"every face you pass on the street is the main character of a story you'll never read."

the problem

you've been performing
for an audience that isn't watching.

- ★ social media turned vulnerability into a performance. everything is curated, filtered, angled- designed to be seen, not felt.
- ★ we've confused being seen with being known. and mistaken engagement with connection.
- ★ the result? everyone is performing. no one is present. and we're all quietly lonely in a room full of people.

what sonder does differently

there won't be any view counts, likes. or followers. when you write here, no one is keeping score. you choose whether to share or keep it private, or share but keep your account anonymous. the only thing sonder asks is that you show up honestly. it won't always be easy. but at least here, nothing is working against you.

a peek into people's thoughts real entries from
real people.

anonymous:

"the prompts caught me off guard. i sat down to write something small and ended up crying. in a good way, i think. i didn't know i needed to say that until it asked."

anonymous:

"the small community here is amazing. everyone here is so nice and supportive. i've never felt this understood before, let alone by a stranger."

the friend system BETA

friendship should be earned, not collected.

on sonder, you can't just send a friend request to a stranger. friendship here means something. it has to start with a real interaction.

- ★ join the conversation
reply to someone's post, share a similar story, advice or offer a gentle thought in their thread.
- ★ send a letter
once you've genuinely interacted, you can send a message request. if they accept, you can talk.
- ★ earn the badge
the system notices when you keep showing up for each other. the friend badge is awarded — not requested.

friend badge

stays with you unless you choose to let it go. it won't fade from inactivity

the community

who finds their way here?

sonder isn't for everyone and that's okay. it's for the ones who are tired of being perceived or misunderstood. for the ones who have something real to say but nowhere safe to say it.

- ★ the person who journals privately but wonders if anyone else feels the same way.
- ★ the one who deleted their instagram because it started making them feel worse, not better.
- ★ the one carrying something they haven't told anyone, not because no one cares, but because they don't feel understood.
- ★ the brave ones. the ones willing to explore past the fog to find what's hidden at the other side.

like a beautiful amethyst cave hiding behind a waterfall.
no one will know unless they're brave enough to explore.

if you found us, it means you were searching.
